Facebook co-founder Chris Hughes, one of the company's early investors, has come out and said that Facebook's ability to keep its current size and use is directly at odds with the free and open web. Hughes is no longer the company's primary investor and earlier this year, he wrote an article saying that Facebook is now private because they couldn't find a way to keep it open. And they continue to do that because they are the only one that is able to build Facebook, but the open internet is too fundamental to our way of life to be able to shut it down. Facebook's CEO Mark Zuckerberg has expressed frustration with some of the criticism he's received over the past few months. He said: The debate about the future of the internet has gotten more polarized, with people on both sides who just don't understand why we are trying to build something that is so new. Hughes said the goal for Facebook was to "go out, build the fastest company in the world, and take over everything else." We want to make sure that Facebook is now able to serve as the right platform for commerce and services in the way that we know it to be. But we don't know what that looks like yet and there's a debate about what that looks like. Hughes also took shots at blockchain technology saying that it is the "scalability problem" that makes distributed ledgers so interesting. "I can guarantee that if Facebook went down it would not be taken over by Facebook, but would continue to be a free and open internet." Mark Zuckerberg has recently said that the company plans to start moving more services to its own decentralized network. Image credit: Arxiv.orgQ: Which version of
